Cristina Vasilescu, project manager of H2020 ENLARGE project, is a researcher within the Institute for Social Research.

Her main areas of expertise are public policy analysis and evaluation, with a particular focus on local sustainable development policies and ESIF; participatory processes, social accountability, transparency and performance evaluation in public administrations; institutional capacity and capacity building. On these issues, she has been involved in numerous national and international projects.

For over 40 years, IRS has consolidated its presence in the national research market. IRS is a wholly independent, non-profit cooperative currently counting 60 members.

Our proceeds derive exclusively from activities developed specifically for our clients. IRS places great importance on consolidating our highly qualified internal research structure.

At present, more than 40 researchers and a network of consultants guarantee the excellent quality of our products. We fine-tune our products to meet the specific needs of a wide target of clients, both public and private. This is made possible thanks to the wide spectrum of competencies available within the Institute. Our work is based on a multi-disciplinary, fully integrated approach.

IRS is a part of various international research centre networks and closely collaborates with prestigious universities and qualified experts.

Why a CYOA book in sustainable energy?

- ✓ There are no “best practices” in the design of public policies
- ✓ The capacity of collaborative processes to be part of the democratic system depends on several dimensions: social legitimacy, institutional sustainability and policy effectiveness
- ✓ The design of the process impacts differently on the three dimensions

Creation of the CYOA book in sustainable energy

31 case studies, semi-structured interviews, 1 deliberative event
